Excerpt: . . . 13 CHAPTER XXII. TORMOUTH. He had not wholly quenched his power, A little grain of conscience made him aour. Alfred Tennyson. But as he descended a whisper there fell; It was his good angel, who bade him farewell. Sir Walter Scon. I Have been compelled by the pressure of more important business to leave the Earl of Ducandraque and his reverend friend for a considerable time. I am sorry; sincerely sorry, for it, especially on the chaplains account, knowing as I do-and who does not-the exceeding uncomfortableness, nay, the imminent peril, of remaining so long in wet clothes after a thorough good ducking. I will, however, make all the amends now in my power. Sad, silent, and moody was their journey for the first two hours after their departure from the Rose and Crown. For the inferior felt utterly wornout by his exertions, and the superior was gloomily turning over his prospects, and recurring uneasily to the quiet, cutting reproof of Silvanus Smith. At length his lordship, perceiving that they were within a couple of miles of Axcester, stopped his barouche, and, alighting with the astounded Clarence Porter, desired the vehicle to drive on, saying that he should not sleep at the inn to-night. The menials drove off as desired, wondering rather what new freak their frolicsome master had taken it into his head to practise. Clarence! said Lord Ducandraque, as soon f as the departing wheels denoted that they were secure from being...
