Also some figure of a section of the eye-ball, such as contained in all works on Anatomy or Physiology; a section of the cat's eye is represented in Anatomical Technology, Fig. i26. i. Review Pract. VI 5-7, for the location of the eye, the form of the Orbit, and the Plica or third eyelid. 1. The following directions and descriptions refer directly to the sheep's eye; but that of the cat might be employed instead, and should be compared if possible. a. If possible the eyes should retain the lids for a width of 1-2 cm., and special care should be taken to retain their mesal (inner or nasal) junction; if the lids have been removed the directions in 5-7 cannot be followed. 3. Determination of the Aspects. --The cephalic (facial, anterior, or ectal), whether or not partly covered by the lids, is smooth and more regularly convex and presents (in the sheep) an elliptical area surrounded by a brown line. The caudal (cranial, posterior, or ental) aspect may be hidden by masses of fat and by the muscles; if these have been partly removed the remnants will still serve to distinguish this from the other. 4. The Eyelids. --Note that their ectal surface is hairy, and that along the free margins are longer hairs, and less regular and less gracefully curved than the lashes of man; they are more numerous on the upper lid, and from this...
